Rescript.—The city of Belfast has, for a long period maintained an underground or covered drain, running through an ancient brook which in its na ural state carried a covered drain, running through an ancient brook which in its na ural state carried a considerable volume of water through the city to the sea. For many years the drain has served to carry off waste water and foulings from the houses and stores situated in its vicinity. It is complainants and respondent have adjoining premises through which the drain run. Lately the city diverted the drain at a point just above complainants premises, carrying it around the premises of both parties, and uniting the new link with the old drain below respondent's land. Thereupon the respondent intreatened to stop up the old drain on his own land thereby preventing the complainants using it alleging that their occuration is wroogful and injurious to hin—the complainants deaying it. And the complainants claim not only the right to have the benefit of the natural brook for their waste, but also the right to a greater enjoyment of it, acquired by the public by ## which it is a part Maine Elections,

Democrats have a chance to carry several Maine cities in to-day's municipal elections in Maine. The odds sgainst them are great, of course, but Pine Tree Democrats don't mind triflee of that sort Judging from the returns the Democrats concluded not to accept the "chance" this year With the exception of Lewiscon, where the Democratic candidate for Mayor barely pulled through, with the City Council strongly against him, the Republicans made uniform gains throughout the State. It is extremely fortunate that our Democratic brethren do not mind "trifles of this sort" as they would be in perpetual mourning if they were politically sensitive. Maine takes no stock in the sham reform Administration that has been fastened upon the people for just four years and make that fact known in these eliminary contests.

His Work After the War.

On Mr. Beecher's return from England, wearied and exhausted as he was, his overtaxed energies were forced to meet the strain of receptions and public speeches. He delivered addresses at the Academy of Music and elsewhere to wildly enthusiastic audiences, recounting his experiences in England and speaking on the state of public opinion. Joan after the close of the war he made a visit to the South. The reconstituction period under Johnson came on. Then Mr. Eeccher took a position that was unpalstable to a large part of the Republican party. He delivered a sermon on the forgivences of induries, and quoted the existing crists as a fitting occusion for applying the doctrine, and in the well-known Cleveland letter he emphasized his position.

New York, March 8. A firethis morning in the store of Nicoll, the tailor, in the ing in the store of Nicolt, the tailor, in the Bowery, caused a loss of between $60,000 and $60,000. Trains on the elevated railroad were blocked by the flames. The blockade extended all the way down to Seventeenth street. A number of passengers left one of the trains at Seventeenth street and started to walk along the narrow path at the side of the traik to the station of 14th street. While doing so the blockade was raised and trains began to start. Their motion shook the pathway to such an extent that number of the passengers were thrown down to the street below. Three of these were instantly killed and seven others badly injured.

at Nicoll the tailor's, gained such headway that the whole available force of firemen in the district were summoned to fight it. The flames spread to low frame buildings on either side of the burning building, which were entirely destroyed, and those abutting upon them in Chrystie and Broome streets badly damaged. The total loss is not less than $100,000. Several people had narrow escapes for their lives. The narrow platform beside the railroad track, from which the people fell, was about two and one-half feet wide. Now this five pounds was gone. It had been given to Trip in a note, not in gold. She had not changed it; she had had no occasion, no opportunity, to change it; and one day—it was the very day after her marriage—Mr. Beaufort horrowed it of her. She did not like at once to remird him of the money, though he had asked the loan for ten minutes to pay for coels. But, when a week passed and Lothing was said of the five pourds, she ventured timidly to recall it to Algernor. He langhed. "My dear Tr p, what can you want money for? I pay for everything. Had he lied to her about that ring, as he had lied about he Norway journey, and the court in Gloucestershire, and the house in Piccardilly She would like to know. She would be guided by this. This was a matter in which she could satisfy herself; and, of course, there was still just a possibility that he was really prevented from crossing to Norway as proposed, that he had some property in Gloucestershire and a house undergoing repairs in Piccallity. So she resolved to put this matter to a test, herncial test, and act according as it gave reply. If Mr. Beaufort had been false in this ho was false in everything. She would write to her father, tell him everything, and heg him to come to London and come to an explanation with her husband.

Then Trip heard her husbard's step, as though he were coming to the states, and she stole back as she had descended. What was the meaning of this?

To come to some understanding, she asked for her boots. The woman said she was sorry, she had put one pair to dry over the kitchen range, and the tire had been too hot, it had burned them. The soles had warped and euried so that the threads were torn, and the top leather had parted from them!

Presently an old man advanced to him, and saying he had a pain in his head, squatted on the ground. The medicineman arose, and placing himself behind his patient, coiled the snake around his head, and, while holding it there, uttered a guttural chant, occasionally causing the snake to vibrate its rattles. He then-quickly uncoiled the snake and swong it head foremost away from the man shead, at the same time making the sound, wishind the medicine-man had the snake along the limb, its head resting on the hand. He chanted again, caused it to rattle, and swong it away as before. The old man arose, and with a satisfied air wulked away.
